Gruter Institute Workshop on Growth

This workshop pulls together a highly diverse, interdisciplinary group of participants to discuss growth – economic and biological. Given your diverse backgrounds, we have planned for some of you to give longer prepared talks, while others may have shorter talks or comments from an applied perspective, aimed at catalyzing discussion. We hope to foster a very rich discussion both during our formal session and during the breaks and meals. Many of our past conferences have focused on the interplay between human behavior and innovation and the basic nature of innovation and economic growth. We will seek to continue this discussion here, but also more fully examine growth as an economic and biological phenomenon (including, e.g., the processes involved, the cost of those processes, and the institutions, structures, technologies, and other applications that accelerate or hinder growth).
